CONCLUSIONS

Parents shall communicate to their children their diagnosis when they feel ready to inform them.

It is crucial to help them to express doubts and feelings that may arise towards the new diagnosis.

It is important that parents, doctors and nurses get involve the teenager child into their own treatment.

The aim of the educational stage is to allow them to be emotionally intelligent.

The mutual-help group allow us to “help other women and to be helped”, you get a feeling of social utility.

The NGOs develop a crucial role as mediator between the scientific community and the patients.
